INDEPENDENT SURVEY REVEALS SA YOUNG PEOPLE IN CARE NEED MORE SAY IN THEIR CARE PLANS

Adelaide, 12th April, 2019, today CREATE Foundation will hold a state briefing on findings from the largest independent survey of South Australian children and young people with an out-of-home care experience. The results indicate that half of young people surveyed remain unaware of their care plan, experience placement instability and lack the appropriate channels to have input into the plan for their own life.

Key findings indicate that 30% of respondents knew about a case plan (which is lower than the national figure of 43.6%) and of that, only 40% were involved in making the plan for their life. Nationally, 92.7% of respondents agreed with the statement that they “felt safe and secure” in their placement, 68% of SA respondents strongly agreed with the statement. 36.4% of respondents had been moved from a placement they didn’t want to leave. When it came to leaving care, just under 10% of 15-18-year-olds knew about their leaving care plan. Only about 5% of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander respondents were aware of their Cultural Support Plan.

The latest survey is the only one of its kind being via direct consultation with children and young people about their care experience under the National Framework for Protecting Australia’s Children 2009–2020. The lack of access to those who are currently living in care presents a significant challenge for giving a voice to children and young people about their direct experience and needs.

The highly anticipated report, titled: Out-of-Home Care in Australia: Children and Young People’s Views After 5 Years of National Standards¹ is a follow up from CREATE’s 2013 independent Report: Experiencing Out-of-Home Care in Australia: The Views of Children and Young People. This study concentrated on placement issues and levels of participation, and dealt with all life domains including education, health, relationships (family and friends), identity, and culture.

In the latest survey, over 1,275 children and young people between 10-17 years old, shared invaluable insights into what is working well and what still needs to be improved in the child protection system. The survey focussed on these key areas: knowledge about care planning, having a say in their plan for their life, if young people feel safe and secure in their placement, and feeling prepared to transition to independence (leave care).

22-year-old Adelaide Aboriginal woman, Brooke Oliver, said: “I’m passionate about breaking the cycle and making them [young people] know that at the end of the day they are worth it and not just a statistic. They need to give the kids control of their life back, have choices and options to choose their life and dignity of safe risk.”

“There needs to be more funding and support and awareness so workers can sit down with children and young people, give validation and consistency that is key for having a positive influence on young people.” Brooke is planning to study a Bachelor of Social Science.

The survey found that children and young people clearly indicated it was important to them to have a say about decisions affecting their care experience, particularly concerning their daily activities, where they lived, and their contact with family members.

A comprehensive set of findings will be revealed at the briefing, with key insights for SA shown below:

- 42% children and young people did not live with their siblings also in care, (split sibling placements), the highest number across Australia. Only 14% were placed with all their siblings.
- Only two thirds were 'very likely' to talk about their concerns with someone, and were more likely to talk to their carer, not their caseworker.
- Disappointingly, young people had the lowest rankings on both level of knowledge about their family story (rating their knowledge at 50%); and awareness of the charter of rights for children and young people (at 20%).
- 66% of children and young people said they experienced difficulty in making friends (the second highest nationally).
- Children and young people in home-based care tended to have a more stable care experience than in Residential Care or Independent Living; Kinship Care respondents reported the most stable placements, with three quarters of these meeting the Standard.

CREATE's Executive Director of Research and survey author, Dr Joseph McDowall spoke about how the reports, over the past five years, addressing the national standards clearly show where to direct focus to improve the out-of-home care system in Australia.

"Children and young people want more meaningful participation in the decision-making that affects them directly. They need to be more involved in all aspects of life-course planning, particularly when considering their future as autonomous members of the community."

"Relationships with carers are recognised as critically important, however, more resources, encouraging reflective practice and team building, must be directed to enabling caseworkers to perform their role effectively in addressing the needs of those for whom they are responsible."

"Finally, greater effort must be expended by governments to ensure that staff in all residential care facilities are trauma-informed and trained in providing essential therapeutic support."

Ms Jacqui Reed, CREATE Foundation Chief Executive shared that the results overall clearly illustrated the importance of meaningfully including children and young people in care and cultural support planning, through to transition planning for their entry to adulthood.

"The new survey found that most children and young people have little awareness of planning processes or plans about them, even when workers maintain that plans exist", commented Ms Reed.

"Child friendly processes reflect a respect for the basic rights of a child or young person to know about and inform decisions impacting them and their care journey. To develop plans in isolation discounts young people and in turn their links to information, supportive adults and cultural connections that could all be part of ongoing supports. It is vital to see the system establish robust training and tools for workers to strengthen connection – potentially also strengthening placement stability for young people".

The results have revealed a wide range of domains which require focus and attention to strengthen a system under strain. What remains disheartening for CREATE Foundation is to continually see that not only are young people growing up with the extreme challenges of placement instability, there remains a profound lack of opportunities for young people to have a say in important decisions that affect their lives and to feel they are heard (68%).

Event Information: CREATE's state briefing event is taking place at the Brocas Community Centre, 111 Woodville Road, St Clair, South Australia, 2-4pm, Tuesday 9th April, 2019. Presenters include Executive Director of Research and survey author, Dr Joseph McDowall, sector and government representatives, as well as hearing powerful stories shared by CREATE's young people on their experiences, followed by a lively discussion around how the child protection sector can work together to improve the lives of children and young people in out-of-home care. RSVP to attend the event by phoning CREATE SA on (08) 8212 8898 email claudine.scalzi@create.org.au
