Transitioning to Adulthood from Out-of-home care: Independence or Interdependence

Social media blurbs and copy

Social media blurb 1

CREATE has released its latest National Report, this time with a focus on the experiences of young people who have left care. We dive into topics such as education, health, youth justice involvement and more, to find out whether outcomes have improved for young people leaving care over the past 10 years.

Social media blurb 2

“It’s time to rethink the idea of leaving care.”

CREATE’s latest report focuses on the experiences of young people who have left care. Expanding on our previous research, we asked 325 young people about their experiences. Our conclusion: to create meaningful change to outcomes for young people, we need to rethink the idea of leaving care altogether. Find out more: www.create.org.au/research-and-publications

Social media blurb 3

What’s changed for young people leaving care nationally after 10 years of National Standards? Not a lot. Our latest report followed on from our previous research into the experiences of young people leaving care, and over the past 10 years, while we’ve seen jurisdictional successes, steps in the right direction like Victoria implementing HomeStretch, and we’ve seen marginal improvements in some areas such as education, young people leaving care are continually disadvantaged overall.

Take a look at our report to learn more, and read our recommendations.

Social media blurb 4

Our latest report shows that First Nations young people are generally further disadvantaged in 4 key areas, compared to non-Indigenous young people. These are: education, youth justice engagement, absence from placements, and becoming parents younger. Outside of these areas, all young people in care face similar levels of disadvantage when it comes to life domains like housing, life skills, mental health and support.
